

Etruria 1769: The First Day's Vase

The Potteries Museum have acquired a black basalt stoneware vase and cover, painted and inscribed in English and Latin. Dated 13 June 1769 the vase was made by Josiah Wedgwood himself on the opening day of the Etruria factory. Passed by descent through the Wedgwood family it is being sold at auction on 7 July.

Wedgwood - known as one of the most famous and pioneering potters of the Industrial Revolution - treasured the First Day's Vases and said that they should not be sold. He made them himself when his new factory Etruria opened on 13th June 1769.

Two of the other vases are owned by the V&A and displayed in the Wedgwood Museum in Staffordshire. The third vase is on a long-term loan to the British Museum.

Image

Rare Wedgwood vase to return to the city
Region

West Midlands
Grant awarded
£287,500
Year awarded
2016
Related News

Wedgwood's First Day's Vase is back on public display

An iconic vase formed by master potter Josiah Wedgwood is back on permanent display in Stoke-on-Trent after it was saved for the nation

It's coming home - rare Wedgwood vase to return to the city!

Campaigners are celebrating after securing enough money to save a rare piece of pottery made by master potter Josiah Wedgwood days before deadline